- 11.7 Self- Assessment

11.1 Introduction to Translation Studies

The study of translation theory, description, and application is the focus of the multidisciplinary area of translation studies. It seeks to understand the process of translation, the roles of translators, and the impact of translations on different cultures and societies. The field encompasses a variety of approaches and methodologies, drawing from linguistics, literary studies, cultural studies, and more.

11.1.1 Historical Context

The origins of translation studies can be seen in the writings of Cicero and Horace, who both had early conversations on translation theory. The field gained significant academic recognition in the 20th century, with the establishment of dedicated translation studies programs and the publication of influential texts.

Quotations:

1. "Translation is that which transforms everything so that nothing changes." (Grass, "The Tin Drum")

2. "Translation studies has evolved to address the complexities of translating across languages and cultures, emphasizing the importance of both linguistic and cultural fidelity." (Bassnett, "Translation Studies")

11.2 Prominent Theories and Approaches

Translation studies encompass a wide range of theories and approaches, each offering different perspectives on how translation should be approached and evaluated. Some of the most influential theories include equivalence, skopos theory, and descriptive translation studies.

11.2.1 Equivalence

Equivalence is one of the foundational concepts in translation theory, focusing on the idea that the translated text should maintain a similar meaning and impact as the source text. This method places a strong emphasis on striking a balance between the target text's readability and the source text's accuracy.

Quotations:

1. "Equivalence in translation is the closest possible match between the source language and the target language, maintaining the same meaning and effect." (Nida, "Toward a Science of Translating")
2. "The pursuit of equivalence in translation involves negotiating the tension between fidelity to the source text and the needs of the target audience." (Pym, "Exploring Translation Theories")

11.2.2 Skopos Theory

Hans Vermeer's skopos theory moves the emphasis from equivalency to the goal (skopos) of the translation. This approach holds that the main objective of translation is to accomplish the intended meaning in the target culture, even if this calls for substantial changes to the original text.

Quotations:

1. "The skopos theory posits that the primary determinant of a translation's success is its purpose in the target culture." (Vermeer, "Skopos and Commission in Translational Action")
2. "In skopos theory, the translator's decisions are guided by the intended function of the translation, rather than strict adherence to the source text." (Nord, "Translating as a Purposeful Activity")

11.2.3 Descriptive Translation Studies

Descriptive translation studies (DTS), proposed by Gideon Toury, advocates for the empirical study of translations as they exist in the real world. DTS aims to describe and analyze translation practices and norms within specific cultural and historical contexts, rather than prescribing how translations should be done.

Quotations:

1. "Descriptive translation studies focuses on understanding translation practices and norms through empirical research and analysis." (Toury, "Descriptive Translation Studies and Beyond")
2. "DTS seeks to uncover the factors that influence translation decisions, providing a comprehensive view of translation as a cultural practice." (Hermans, "The Manipulation of Literature")

11.3 Cultural and Linguistic Considerations in Translation
